

ANGELENO INTERIORS
 SPRING 2012 / VIRGINIA

THE URBAN ELECTRIC CO.

Opposite page: Custom-designed sofas, the Jasper Evan coffee table and petrified wood stumps from Berbere Imports create a comfortable and chic living room environment. Massimo Vitali's 2009 "Vulcano Sea Ferry" photo hangs above the sofa. Right: Vintage chairs and custom-made chairs were used in the dining room. Urban Electric Company's Virginia lantern hangs above the table, while Martyn Lawrence-Bullard's oversized mirror from Thomas Lavin leans on the wall.

on interesting shapes and textures, and really layering those elements. The idea was to make it beachy, but not in the cliché way."

Clam shells, sea coral and anchor art? It all went overboard. And in their place, says Borsari, was a far simpler plan: Let the 180-degree ocean views star. "The entire design is about keeping the views as the focal point, so everything else has to really play into that idea. But we also kept in mind that even though we wanted the palette to be restrained, we didn't want this to be another beige Orange County beach house, because we've seen plenty of those before."

Throughout the house, from the upstairs open-plan living, dining and kitchen area to the lower level's bedrooms, the trio of designers relied on lots of texture, organic patterns and plenty of unexpected shapes and materials to create a quiet version of oceanfront elegance.

"Nothing jumps out at you here," says Lucas. "You really have to look, and then the design sort of unfolds quietly."